Hacking Vulnerabilities in Real-Time Systems In an effort to better understand and address the vulnerabilities that attackers are exploiting to gain unauthorized access into systems, in late 2017, researchers at the University of Notre Dame developed and tested the first programmatic vulnerability exploitation framework. By developing a framework that allows researchers to programmatically exploit system vulnerabilities, build reliable exploits that need to be leveraged in real-time, and identify backdoors created during system exploitation, the researchers hope to better understand and prevent system compromise. Our results show that the framework can produce exploits that are as or more effective than real-time exploits that rely on leaked exploit tools and decoy documents. Our framework, which can execute exploits on critical real-time systems such as audio systems and flight controls, can be used to design, develop, and deploy exploits, and it was tested on six different exploits. These exploits were combined into six exploits for a series of attacks that can compromise real-time systems. The framework is currently being used to execute exploits in industrial and government environments. 1. Develop a safer web experience Easily and quickly transform website visitors into productive research assets by collaborating with them to achieve meaningful human-centered outcomes through cross-disciplinary, higher-order research. Safer, more efficient, and more collaborative websites: creating more efficient and engaging interactions between people and information. The increased density of social, scholarly, and professional networks across the boundaries between the disciplines. Enhancing the Web Experience: Visual Understanding of Complex Information 2. Broaden representation of scientific excellence The breadth of connection between people and information and the enormous amount of research are barriers to progress. Efficiently connecting researchers' research outputs to multiple information systems. Facilitating scholarly communication among researchers and other scholars. Research Information at Your Fingertips 3. Deploy other uses for your research Public and private sector organizations hold immense amounts of data that organizations must sort through to discover the value of the information and to make it more readily available and accessible. As part of that data sorting, researchers must identify and recover information important to the organization and protect the organization from the inadvertent disclosure of private information. Empowering organizations with access to information. Creating a secure system for organizations. Identifying and retaining critical research publications that are needed by organizations. 4. Respond faster to research failures There is a lot of money at stake with most research projects. If a scientist 50b96ab0b6
